SOLDIERS' BAGGAGE.

The military correspondent of the Colonie Gazette remarks that the French go to battle with such little baggage that the Prussians did not even consider it worth while to bring in the French army in Italy was not allowed to take more than three horses with him, and the number of transport horses and mambots¹ much less with the French than with the Prussians. This says the correspondent, is a result of the want of organization in France, but had of warfar. "In 1866 we all had by far too many things with us, and a great number of persons accompanied the army as amateurs, who did more harm than good. As we were always victorious, this excess of horses, wagons, and other vehicles, which were of much consequence, although in many cases they delayed the arrival of provisions which were urgently required for the troops. But if the Prussian army had been defeated, this multitude of useless things and people would have caused a complete victory. The wagons would have impeded the retreat, and perhaps have caused the capture by the enemy of guns, ammunition, and soldiers."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

We commend the case of John Owen, the Deaf-mute murderer, to the consideration of those who advocate capital punishment, as a fit punishment; and we invite them after carefully reading the accounts given in the newspapers of his last hours to say what punishment it would be possible to substitute in the case of criminals like the "Ice-therapist," that is, in the case of persons who commit crimes because every man is capable of being reformed, and the end of all punishment is reformation. Looked at, however, as a hard practical matter, and in the light of common experience, does one not feel that John Owen was capable of reforming? He has been a deaf-mute all his life, and unperformed crime for which he suffered, down to all the minor details of his conduct, his brutal jesting about the hangman, his fierce repulsion of the chaplain, the ghastly pitiability of his longing to forget his past, the misery of his life since he became deaf, showed that he was and would ever be a mere wild beast from whom society would never be safe till he was rendered powerless to harm. In the presence of such cases as this all corrective theories disappear, and mankind is brought face to face with the question of capital punishment, which justifies us in abhorring John Owen, as we would abhor a dangerous beast or reptile.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE "STANDARD" ON OUR

DEFEAT IN CHINA.

The trial of the case is now over by the very necessity which there was for reaffirming the neutrality of Belgium. There could have been no reason for Mr. Gladstone to break through his pacific reserve, and to insist upon renewing the Treaty of 1859, unless he had some grounds for believing that the British Government was in danger of an attack upon Belgium. Granted that there is such a danger, what are our prospects of repelling it? To decline to Prussia, or to France, that we are as strong as we have ever been since Waterloo, is, we fear, not very likely to impress either of these Powers. Seeing how greatly each of these two Powers has increased in the strength and the efficiency of their armaments since Waterloo, it is probable that they would least respect than the "Standard" of Queen Victoria. We can perceive value of this assurance, it is a question which the British people like to ask themselves pretty frequently about this season. There are some other questions which they would do well to consider in connection with the present state of affairs. What would become of the Waterloo? Are France and Prussia much stronger now than they were in 1815? Have all the other nations consented to abide by the standard of efficiency which Mr. Cardwell has adopted? Is Mr. Cardwell himself equal to getting on board the ship of state, and to the variety of his warlike resources? Supposing that the English army were as numerous now as in the Waterloo period, should that make us any the more assured of our position? Is it possible that even Mr. Cardwell does not know where the Waterloo situation is now since Waterloo? In 1815 England was only one of a powerful military confederation armed against France. In 1870 each of the combatants has an army at least twice as large as the whole confederate force available against the first. Now, however, the English army, the naval power, the extent, and the resources of England are relatively far greater now than they were in the Waterloo campaign. She has increased in a ratio far larger than that of any of her rivals, in riches, population, and in that goes to make up a strong army to defend itself. Is it not also a mockery, therefore, to use the Waterloo test to measure our military strength—pretend that we are as strong now as we were in 1815, when our entire available army, including the retired colonial forces, numbered only 100,000 men? 100,000 men, or 10,000 could be spared for foreign service without great danger and inconvenience.—Standard, Aug. 13.

The Lancet advocates the appointment of a medical officer in the mercantile marine to be sent to the Mediterranean to help the navy in future. The Lancet thinks that sanitary arrangements in war vessels would, under this plan, be better looked after than they are.

CURIOUS BEHAVIOR OF PRINCE CARL.—A Monterey paper says: "The trial of the Prince in the San Francisco District Court of Justice, before the Honorable Justice of this county, wherein the lady is the defendant. The parties are both Spanish, and live at Half-moon Bay. The plaintiff claims $10,000 damages, which he is supposed to be about the sum total of the fair señorita's world possessions. The defense is that she is a widow, and for us are advised, in which case a man brought against a woman for giving him the mittened. This is one of the heretofore undeveloped principles of men's rights, which has generally been monopolized by women."
